Will my identity become known?

We understand that when you supply information to us it may have a potential impact on the relationship between you and those you are reporting, particularly in the case of a worker and their employer.

You can always choose to be anonymous when reporting concerns to us so no one will know your identity. However, it is useful to have your contact details in case we need to ask you for more information. There is whistleblowing protection under the Employment Rights Act 1996 which protects most employees if they raise a concern about wrongdoing – either internally or externally.

Will my identity be protected if I report a concern?

We will do our best to protect your identity (if desired) and will not disclose it except where lawfully required to do so. We will take all reasonable steps to maintain confidentiality but we cannot give any categorical assurances as circumstances may mean that disclosure of your identity becomes unavoidable – for example if we are ordered by a court to disclose it.

What happens after I report a concern?

After you report your concern to us we will start making some initial inquiries and we may contact you to clarify information (if you provide your contact details). We do not encourage you to try to get any new information.

If following an initial assessment of all the information we consider it appropriate, we will refer your concern internally for investigation. However, please note we are unable to give feedback on the outcome of any assessment or of any investigation (if one is conducted) due to legal restrictions.
